Remembering our Neighbors

Paula F.

Though they are no longer with us, those we have lost never truly leave. Their friendship and memory stays with us.

But I also say this: that light is an invitation to happiness, and that happiness, when it's done right, is a kind of holiness, palpable and redemptive. -Mary Oliver

What was the happiest day of your life? What made it a happy day? Were you alone, or were otherthere? According to Psychology Today, reminiscing with others can make you happier in themoment. Studies show that thinking about happy memories can interrupt negative thoughts andboost our sense of satisfaction. Making time to remember and share stories about our happiestdays can have a significant impact on our overall happiness today and can even help us to bounceback when we face inevitable challenges. Reminiscing is good for the spirit and choosing to shareand receive stories of happiness together is one way of experiencing holiness and healing. Thismonth, try making time each day to share a happy story with someone, and see what happens!
